FlowerPower FlowerPower The FlowerPower plant in Japan is the largest hydrogen power plant in the world. It produces over 930,000 tonnes of hydrogen per year. More than 100 million liters of sewage water are used daily to produce this clean and sustainable energy source. A power plant that uses the energy from bacteria to produce hydrogen The gasification system consists of nozzles, which spray the raw sewage into the reactor, where the process of gasification takes place. The water then turns into gas, which passes through a membrane to separate the hydrogen and oxygen. After that, the hydrogen leaves the reactor and comes out of the chimney. The carbon dioxide is absorbed by the calcium oxide, and the rest of the sewage water is recycled. The technology of "hydrogen power" was developed in the Soviet Union in the 1980s, and then it was later on adopted to various parts of the world. Important facts The amount of energy generated by the hydrogen produced by the FlowerPower plant is equal to eight nuclear power plants with the capacity to produce 750,000 megawatts of electricity. In this case, on average, three and half megawatts of hydrogen is produced from one liter of sewage water. The production of hydrogen on a large scale stimulates the growth of bacteria - this growth brings about significantly more bacteria than in a pond full of water. In the FlowerPower plant all the necessary technologies to separate the hydrogen and oxygen are located in one place, which helps to increase the efficiency of the 648931e174
